Customer Reviews

I never thought that I had a problem. I mean you read about every kind of addict, alcohol, drugs, sex, etc.... I used to flip through various magazines reading about these accounts of people who suffered from addiction. How they lost everything, family friends, jobs... I'd read these stories all the while sipping my morning coffee, and think about how glad I was to be so grounded in society. By my fifth cup of morning coffee I'd have read the entire magazine finished. In the end I won. I gave up coffee and cigarettes. But it was easy. It took the help of everyone around me. I had to be honest with myself about the addiction. I started to research caffeine addiction to understand how it works. I started to read up on what caffeine was doing to my body and my mind. I gave myself reasonable benchmarks. For the first month I could have three solid cups a day, one after each meal. I decided on after opposed to before because I didn't want to suppress my appetite. And when I wanted more I either drank water or went for a bike ride. Sometimes I did both. By Month two I had cut out the after dinner coffee. That was hard. I had to switch to caffeine free herbal tea. And lots of water. But very slowly I started to get my energy back, and feel in control of my life again. Coffee slowly became something that I could control opposed to something that controlled me. What I really had to examine was my emotional dependency on the drug. I had started drinking coffee at a point of weakness in my life and had grown to rely on it as a crutch. Having discovered this I needed to come up with an alternative method for dealing with my stress. I thought about my mom and Mrs. Anderson. They had both helped me out through two critical points in my life. Coffee both began and ended with that.
