Make it Mandatory! Students in the Schools of Education should be required to read this book. While there are many ways to connect through the internet, all teachers will be inspired by Whitaker, Casas, and Zoul's, What Connected Teachers Do Differently. Inspired not just about how technology brings teachers and schools together, how the book reinvigorates one's love for teaching. Readers are inspired when authors tell them, "...to take pride in the fact that you do have unique talents and experiences, (that) others not only can, but will, learn from you.â • (p.6) The book is full of tips and ways to effectively use social media tools. For example, a school might consider having more than one Twitter account. â œPossibilities include an account for the principal, student club/activities, athletics, fine arts, and even parent/booster account(s).â • (p. 31)One of the best parts about the book is the end of the chapters. The authors have compiled three sections that bid interaction. The first section is called â œFollow 5â • and offers the reader five different examples of the concepts that the authors are describing. The examples are of teachers, administrators, and professionals modeling these best practices. Along with a brief description of how the model utilizes the concept, the authors give out the twitter handles for each of these modelers as a way for readers to directly connect. The authors have added a second end-of-chapter resource in the â œFind 5â • section. This section shares and describes links to resources that are pertinent to a chapterâ™s content. For example, the first chapter, â œInvest in P2LNâ • has the resource called â œTwitter in 60 Seconds.
